Randy Watkins - Tournament Chairman

Spinal Muscular Atrophy (SMA) is a genetic disease. It weakens the muscles, making it difficult or, in most cases, impossible for a person with SMA to move around and do routine physical tasks like getting dressed. People with SMA may be able to stand when they are very young, but few ever possess the ability to walk. And for those that do, the ability is short lived.

That is because SMA gets worse over time. Weaker muscles not only affect ones ability to walk, but to breathe and pump blood through the body. To a person with SMA, a simple cold is a dangerous threat that, if ignored, can easily and quickly become a case of pneumonia. SMA is fatal—many times because of respiratory and pulmonary complications.
